DETAILED ACTION

Allowable Subject Matter

1. Claims 1-22 are allowed.
2. The following is an examiner's statement of reasons for allowance:

Re claim 1, the independent claim includes "measuring a plurality of times during the aspiration the pressure at two points of the shaft; calculating by integration from the measured pressure the volume of the liquid displaced in the shaft; verifying if the calculated volume corresponds to the predetermined value; and generating an indication relating to this verification" in combination with the remaining claim limitation is not taught and/or made obvious by the prior art. See remarks pages 2-3, received on 9/15/09. As depicted in figs. 1 and 2, Boillat et al. (2004/0020938), considered closest to related art, teaches a control cabinet (14) that includes an elongated body (36). At each end of the elongate body (36) it has a cylindrical housing (38) and in its central portion, it (36) has a cavity (40). It (36) also has pierced, along its axis, with upper duct opening (42), on the one hand, into the upper housing (38) and, on the other hand, into cavity (40) with a lower duct opening (44), on the other hand, into the lower housing (38) (Par. 46). The cavity (40) houses a differential pressure flow meter (46). The differential pressure flow meter (46) senses the differential pressure between its inlet and outlet of fluid passing through it (Par. 56). The flow meter (46) detects malfunctions in the device such as sealing problems, or blockage of the ducts (42 or 44) (Par. 64). During operation a small amount of air is first drawn up by the needle (12) so as to form an air bubble between the liquid (52) and the fluid/liquid (30) for dispensing. The flow meter (46) whose output allows the control circuit (58) to calculate the volume of air drawn in, that is to say the volume of the bubble. When the measured air volume reaches the desired value contained in the computer (60) the robot (20) introduces the needle (12) into the dispensing fluid/liquid (30) (Par. 69). The flow meter (46) records a sudden variation in pressure when the needle (12) goes in. The computer (60) determines the position of the needle (12) (Par. 70). When, on the basis of the information supplied by the flow meter (46), the computer determines that the desired amount of the dispensing fluid/liquid (30) has been drawn up in to the needle (12) and the valve (48) is closed (Par. 73). The flow meter (46) is inserted in the path of the duct (Pars. 28-30). The needle (12) is equivalent to a shaft portion of the dispensing device. Boilat et al. does to teach or suggests inserting the flow meter in the path of the needle. Boillat et al. does not teach a measuring a plurality of times during the aspiration the pressure at two points of the shaft; calculating by integration from the measured pressure the volume of the liquid displaced in the shaft; verifying if the calculated volume corresponds to the predetermined value; and generating an indication relating to this verification.

Re claim 3, the independent claim includes “measuring a plurality of times during the aspiration the pressure at two points of the shaft; calculating by integration from said measurements as they vary throughout the aspiration, the volume of liquid aspirated in the shaft; to verify that this volume corresponds to the volume of the desired value and generating an indication relating to this verification” in combination with the remaining claim limitation is not taught and/or made obvious by the prior art. See remarks pages2-3, received on 9/15/09. As depicted in figs. 1 and 2, Boillat et al. (2004/0020938), considered closest to related art, teaches a control cabinet (14) that includes an elongated body (36). At each end of the elongate body (36) it has a cylindrical housing (38) and in its central portion, it (36) has a cavity (40). It (36) also has pierced, along its axis, with upper duct opening (42) , on the one hand, into the upper housing (38) and, on the other hand, into cavity (40) with a lower duct opening (44), on the other hand, into the lower housing (38) (Par. 46). The cavity (40) houses a differential pressure flow meter (46). The differential pressure flow meter (46) senses the differential pressure between its inlet and outlet of fluid passing through it (Par. 56). The flow meter (46) detects malfunctions in the device such as sealing problems, or blockage of the ducts (42 or 44) (Par. 64). During operation a small amount of air is first drawn up by the needle (12) so as to form an air bubble between the liquid (52) and the fluid/liquid (30) for dispensing. The flow meter (46) whose output allows the control circuit (58) to calculate the volume of air drawn in, that is to say the volume of the bubble. When the measured air volume reaches the desired value contained in the computer (60) the robot (20) introduces the needle (12) into the dispensing fluid/liquid (30) (Par. 69). The flow meter (46) records a sudden variation in pressure when the needle (12) goes in. The computer (60) determines the position of the needle (12) (Par. 70). When, on the basis of the information supplied by the flow meter (46), the computer determines that the desired amount of the dispensing fluid/liquid (30) has been drawn up in to the needle (12) and the valve (48) is closed (Par. 73). The flow meter (46) is inserted in the path of the duct (Pars. 28-30). The needle (12) is equivalent to a shaft portion of the dispensing device. Boilat et al. does to teach or suggests inserting the flow meter in the path of the needle. Boilat et al. does not teach measuring a plurality of times during the aspiration the pressure at two points of the shaft; calculating by integration from said measurements as they vary throughout the aspiration, the volume of liquid aspirated in the shaft; to verify that this volume corresponds to the volume of the desired value and generating an indication relating to this verification.
